What is Ocean Protocol?

Ocean Protocol is a blockchain protocol based on Ethereum that enables businesses and individuals to create, exchange, trade and monetize data. Users can employ datatokens to restrict access to data. These datatokens can then be redeemed by users to gain access.

The purpose of the platform is to allow users to share their data while maintaining control over the access and usage of that data. Ocean Protocol has a feature called compute-to-data that allows for sensitive and private data to be used in AI models without compromising privacy. This feature opens the doors to data interoperability in academic research, which means that data from different sources can be used together in a secure and private manner.

Imagine Ocean Protocol as a vast ocean of data, where different ships (data providers) sail and drop anchor to share their valuable cargo (data) with other ships (data users) that are in need. In the same way that ships in the ocean have to follow specific rules and regulations, data providers and users on Ocean Protocol have to follow a certain set of rules to ensure the data is shared in a secure, private and decentralized manner.

In this analogy, each ship is equipped with smart contracts, similar to a ship's manifest, to govern and document the transactions of data - ensuring an equitable exchange and use of data. Ships require fuel to sail, and data providers on Ocean protocol use tokens to access and transact data and services.
